It's a good thing that a benevolent billionaire offers a full-paying scholarship to a talented young bagpiper and you become the fastest bagpiper west of the Mississippi, but how do you know?

Women's collegiate athletics were few and far between; not to mention athletic scholarships and funding. In many cases, that meant cutting men's programs to ensure fairness, especially at Division I schools with heavy investments in high-profile college sports like football and basketball. One of their advantages is that they make students much more attractive to universities. For each student who brings in money through a scholarship, the money that would go to them (through loans or need-based financial aid) can be spent to fund the education of other students. One thing that all scholarship seekers should be careful of is fake scholarships. As former Vice President Dan Quayle once famously said on this subject, „What a terrible thing it is to lose one's mind.“ That might not sound exactly what he meant, but his heart was in the right place. Most financial aid programs today cannot offer support to all students. Title IX, passed in 1972, leveled the playing field by requiring athletics funding to be split equally between men's and women's sports.

California allows officials, boards and other governing bodies in cities and counties to declare emergencies to trigger the state's price gouging law. Price gouging has become quite common in the news media in the wake of the COVID-19 pandemic when state price gouging regulations went into effect due to the national emergency. Price ceilings: Laws limit the maximum price that can be charged for certain goods. Laws often include exceptions for price increases that may be justified in terms of increased supply, transportation, demand, or storage costs. Price gouging is similar to profiteering but can be distinguished by being short-term and local and limited to basic needs such as food, clothing, shelter, medicine, and equipment for the protection of life and property. The increase in public discourse has been linked to increasing shortages related to the COVID-19 pandemic. California has set a 10 percent cap on price increases. Wikimedia Commons has media related to Mount Price. Essential items: Most laws apply only to items necessary for survival, such as food, water, and shelter.
