These parts work together to create useful radio signals. And best of all, they don't rely on finicky cell phone signals. In other words, unlike your phone, where both parties can interrupt or contribute to a conversation with an uninterrupted audio stream, walkie-talkies use a push-to-talk (PTT) system; you need to press a button in turn. Wilderness lovers carry walkie-talkies with them to stay in touch during hiking or hunting trips in areas where cell phone coverage is not available. Mobile phone technology is developing at an incredible pace. But unlike a phone, a walkie-talkie's speaker and microphone are placed right next to each other, and the speaker's volume is much louder, so anyone within earshot can follow the conversation. Let's say you're rafting with a group of friends on a remote river in an area with zero cell phone coverage. No matter what you use them for, walkie-talkies all work pretty much the same way. They are very similar to cordless phone handsets, with bodies containing an antenna as well as a microphone and speaker. To talk, you need to release that button to hear audio from other units.
