

A dad who reported young Indigenous kids running amok and swimming in his pool to police claims he was the victim of a revenge attack where they poured 15 litres of white paint into his pool. Broome, in Western Australia's north-west, was the centre of controversy this past week after an air conditioning tradesman was charged with allegedly cable-tying three Indigenous children who had been swimming in his parents' pool. Matej Radelic was charged with three counts of aggravated assault after shocking video footage was live-streamed from the front of his parents' Cable Beach home. Local resident Lee Du Bray - who grew up in the coastal town and has two Indigenous children - expressed sympathy for Mr Radelic's apparent drastic measure as his pool was similarly invaded six years ago. But Mr Du Bray told Daily Mail Australia when he reported the incidents to police, 'revenge was swift'.

The youths returned twice - the first time with a can of paint which they poured into the pool, and again to smash up the yard and spear the pool's fibreglass floor open with star fence pickets. Indigenous children invaded Mr Du Bray's Broome pool in January 2018, which they later poured a can of paint into and smashed up his yard. When he called police, the kids returned to pour a large can of white paint into the pool which ruined the filtration system, and then came back to spear the fibreglass skin with star pickets. Pots were smashed in the yard at Mr Du Bray's house in Broome's Chinatown quarter, costing him a total $100,000 damage bill. The destruction to his property, Sập gỗ Chiếu ngựa nguyên khối gỗ gõ đỏ khối gỗ đỏ an old pearlers' quarters in Broome's historical Chinatown quarter on Roebuck Bay, ended up costing him $100,000.

Mr Du Bray, who said he loved Broome but feared the epidemic of youth crime meant the idyllic town was at risk, Sập gỗ lim nguyên khối said he had spent $50,000 installing a fibreglass pool in his backyard. 'The moment I went out the pool was invaded by the local kids. I have security cameras which caught the kids climbing over the fence,' he told Daily Mail Australia. 'There were up to a dozen instances and I called police.'

What if a kid drowned in that pool? They would throw the book at me, I'd be in jail. 'Told to clear off, they came back later and emptied an entire four gallon can of paint into the pool. 'It was white paint. It ruined all the filtration system and of course there was the cost to empty, Chiếu ngựa nguyên khối gỗ hương clean and refill the pool. The vandals dumped the paint can (left) in Mr Du Bray's yard and two weeks later returned with star pickets to spear holes in the pool destroying the fibreglass skin (right) and flooding its foundation. One child stands on the verandah ready to jump into the pool while others play near the pool which was later destroyed in 'revenge' attacks after police were called. 'Then weeks later they returned and lobbed star pickets straight through the fibreglass bottom of the pool.'
